Fenians Story

Following the political uprising in Ireland in 1865, 62 supporters of the Irish Republican Brotherhood, known as Fenians were deported in 1867 to the penal colony of Western Australia as the last convicts to ever be sent here.

In 1874, a prisoner smuggled a letter to John Boyle O'Reilly in America. This prompted the brotherhood to organise and fund a rescue mission to salvage the 8 remaining Fenian prisoners by purchasing The Catalpa and setting sail from America in April 1875. Once the group had arrived in Bunbury in March 1876.

Once the group had arrived in Bunbury in March of 1876, they made plans to contact the prisoners. The Catalpa laid anchor in international waters and dispatched a whaleboat to Rockingham on 16 April 1876. The next morning six Fenians who were in work parties outside the prison walls escaped by horse to Rockingham, leaving the other 2 confined due to insubordination. There they boarded the whaleboat and set toward the Catalpa when a storm made the conditions very difficult for the escapees who endured a difficult night at sea.

The following day the escapees eluded the British and reached the Catalpa which set sail immediately for the open waters. The climax came when the British fired warning shots across their bow to force their surrender, at which point the captain of the Catalpa hoisted the "Stars and Stripes".

The British reluctantly call off the chase to avoid an international affair and returned to shore. In August 1876 the Catalpa arrived triumphantly in New York, carrying the Fenian escapees.
